When do you need a metal detector?

Metal detectors are primarily needed in food processing plants that produce packaged goods, and are not typically needed for fresh fruit and vegetable processing.

Metal detectors are often placed within the production line or at the end of the process once the product is packaged. Typically, a metal detector is placed after a size-reduction process that might introduce metal materials.

Several inspection points throughout the production line are useful. Inspecting raw material is advantageous because metal particles can be separated before they are broken up into smaller pieces, which can be harder to detect. Inspections at critical control points are also recommended in order to detect machinery failures, as is a final inspection before the end product is dispatched.

What are the benefits of metal detectors?

1. Detects metal contaminants: Metal detectors check for magnetic and electrical interference, allowing them to detect metallic objects with ease.
2. Ensures food safety for the consumer: Metal detectors offer peace of mind that the food you produce is safe for consumption by the general public.
3. Protects equipment from damage: Foreign contamination by metal chunks or fragments can cause costly damage to machines and equipment.
4. Prevent product recall: Avoiding unnecessary and costly product recalls saves the business time, money, fines and loss of reputation.
5. Comply with food regulations: Metal detectors can help ensure that your business remains HACCP compliant and in line with food safety regulations.
6. Cost effective product inspection: Metal detection systems tend to have lower upfront cost and maintenance expenses than x-ray machines.

B	0-4	Contract cold resistance
C	0-1	Water permeability
X		Test is non applicable or unsuccessfully completed

Thermal Hazards
